Q: When click on any element of the select, then the function must run in the rest elements? I have the below function, who run when click on one of the select element, but when I have a other element, the function of all function not run, how run function who click on any element? function onSelectChange() { alert("onSelectChange"); } option1 option2 option3 option1 option2 option3 click

A: When you pass onchange="onSelectChange()", you're really passing only the function name, not the actual function. You'll need to do something like When you don't specify a this context, the function is executed in the global context, which is not the usual place for event handlers, so you have to explicitly tell it where to execute. A: You should pass a context to the function, in this case a reference to itself. This way the listener is executed in the scope of that specific select, and not in global scope. option1 option2 option3 option1 option2 option

What's New in the?

Deoxyribonucleic acid of female schistosome egg cytoplasm stimulates proliferation of murine T cells in vitro. Numerous studies have shown that tumor-associated antigens or transplantation antigens from tumors can be mimicked by antigens expressed by infective stages of parasitic protozoa. The DNA from eggs of schistosome and other parasitic helminths can generate a strong Th1 response in mice in vivo. However, the mechanism of this autoimmune reaction remains poorly understood. The aim of this study was to determine the effect of DNA from infective stages of a parasitic helminth, Schistosoma mansoni, on the in vitro proliferative response of murine T cells. Conventional T cells from spleen cells of S. mansoni-infected C57BL/6 mice proliferated when cocultured with congenic, syngeneic S. mansoni egg antigens (male or female) but not with male or female rabbit DNA or RNA. This response was specifically blocked by preincubation of the antigens with DNase, but not RNase, suggesting the involvement of DNA in this phenomenon. The proliferative response was not affected by mouse or human-derived DNA, indicating that it was host species specific. The T cells required a direct interaction with S. mansoni egg antigens because they could not proliferate in response to these antigens in the presence of liposomes or cells or when the parasite eggs were inactivated by heat treatment. This work shows that nucleic acid from eggs of S. mansoni, a helminth that is pathogenic to humans, can act as a potent adjuvant for the induction of a T cell response in vivo.
